LITTLETON, Colo. -- Jenna Krebs of Littleton is an ultra-endurance cyclist.

In June she'll compete in a 1,000-mile race Oceanside, California to Taos, New Mexico as part of the Race Across America.

The thousand miles is pretty much nonstop, except for a few hours off the bike to eat or catch a quick nap.

Krebs is the picture of determination. She won a 21-year battle with anorexia, a struggle she calls "daily hell."

Now she's riding her bike to prove anybody can overcome just about anything to succeed in sports and life.

"I want to promote women athletes, health, and fitness, but more importantly being able to set goals and overcome obstacles. I am happily on the road of recovery from anorexia/disordered eating after 21 years of daily hell and hope to help other women and the general population in being able to set goals and to never give up on dreams," she said.
